LINE 610 DESCRIPTION OF FUNCTIONALITY IN EMERGENCY SITUATIONS

Quality Standards:

There are diverse routes between the remote concentrators which add redundancy to the network. The components of the network are equipped with alarms which alert if there are failures. These alarms are sent out by email and text to the Central Office Technicians that are on-call, the Central Office Supervisor, the Head Engineer, and the Operations Manager. The main central office / tandem has a permanent on-site generator; the largest remote concentrators also have permanent on-site generators. Also, the NOC (Network Operations Center) and the Business Office have permanent on-site generators. All of the concentrators are equipped for portable emergency generators. During a power outage, the technician reports the outage to the respective utility company. The power alarms are monitored by several servers and, upon the DC voltage levels falling below the charge level, the servers send out the emails and text alerts to the technicians. The servers that send out the email and text alerts are also monitored by another server that will send an email and text alerts if any of the monitored servers do not function correctly. The battery level is monitored with response time factored in so that a dispatch can have an emergency generator on site before an outage occurs. The emergency generators automatically cycle with a load once a week. The generators have a Major PM performance on them annually.
